

himself for the bereavement by taking to his bosom a second, and even a third one, within the space of seven or eight years.

About the middle of September of the year under review (1768) the Rector again paid a visit to this people, preached for them, administered the Lord's Supper, and endeavored, as usual, to "bring into order" the temporal as well as spiritual affairs of the two congregations. The business talents of this man of God were somewhat out of the usual way in the case of a rigidly trained and highly educated minister of the Gospel, and are deserving of our notice. His organizing and administrative faculties were scarcely less brilliant than his mental and spiritual endowments, which were of the superlative order. His sense of proper order in all human relations, public and private, was a natural gift, and before the middle of his life it had been acutely developed by the circumstances of his position as President of Synod and supervisor of the German Lutheran churches of the Middle Colonies. He had marvellous skill in unraveling tangled affairs, whether long-standing "accounts," or odious and never-ending church-quarrels, and possessed a competent knowledge of the legal forms needed for drawing documents relating to the rights and obligations of congregations and of individuals necessarily connected with them.
